Joseph Quinn

At 25, London-born Quinn has already achieved what most actors only dream of: working alongside great British doyennes of Hollywood. 'I did a play with Olivia Colman at the National, which was a pinch-yourself moment,' he says. 'She is to die for, frankly. It's nauseating how nice she is. There is no artifice there. She has the time of day for everyone and we still text.'

Then he played Helen Mirren's son in Catherine the Great for Sky and HBO. 'It was extraordinary forging a relationship with her,' he reveals. 'She doesn't take herself too seriously and has a fierce sense of humour. It's no wonder she is held in such high acclaim. She's Helen Mirren.'

It was almost inevitable Quinn would fall into acting – his mother was a producer, his father a director turned drama teacher and his stepfather a cinematographer. 'It meant going on set wasn't alien to me,' he says. 'But it hasn't meant they could get me a job, unfortunately.' He's not short of gigs, though. Next up is a starring role in the latest adaptation of JK Rowling's Cormoran Strike novels for the BBC. And Joe's in no rush to jet to LA: 'I'm not going to gatecrash the party. If I'm invited to go, I'll go. I just want to keep working and do good things.' ▷

*Timeless hero pieces now come
with a modern sensibility*

BEST FOOT FORWARD

This season, traditional pieces – think argyle knits, quilted jackets and Prince of Wales checks – have been upgraded for the new decade. Take these Burwood Met Oxfords from British brand Church's, which have been reinvigorated with stud detailing. A time-honoured investment, they'll keep you in step with the trends – without compromising on a classic.
